EMPHIS APPEAL

THE ROTHSCHILDS. There is a romance clustering round the name of Rothschild which makes the death of one of the family a matter of more than common interest. Between forty and fifty years ago, there was an humble house on the Ghetto of Frankfort, whose windows were always seen on one particular night within the annual cicle to wear a glitter of light, which, as it was cast from the old Jewish lamps, threw a glastly glimmer on the decayed and dust-eaten dwellings around it. On this hight, the eve of the Jewish New Years the five members of the house of Rothschild—the sons of Frankfort, Vienna, Paris, and Naples—came, no matter from what ends of the earth, to gather with filial devotion round a weird, withered old lady, who still clung to the eld spot from which the family had started. The house, we believe, stands, but the stairs are silent. The mother is, of course, dead. The five sons have departed. The death of the last, Baron James, some few years since, excited great regret in Paris, where his Oriental splendor of living and sump-oriental splen excited great regret in Paris, where his Oriental splendor of living and sumpnousness of hospitality made him a feature of its life. In monetary genius, and in elevation of character and mind, he was the star of the house of Rothschild. indeed, his courtly bearing and polishtions with the leading sovereigns of Europe wear more the character of a diplomatist than of a financier. The elder branch has fallen. And now death has begun to knock at the door of the younger branches. Some years since, prior to his father's death, the eldest son of Baron James, who will be remembered in social circles as a visitor for some time in New York about fifteen years ago, died, having merely passed into manhood. And the other day was published the news of the death of Baron Meyer de Rothschild, a member of the house of the London Rothschilds.

Meyer was the second son of Nathan, the founder of the London house, a man domatist than of a financier. The eld-blockade, while carrying on business at Manchester, he amassed an enormous Manchester, he amassed an enormous fortune through smuggled trade, He knew of the victory of Waterloo some hours before it reached the British govhours before it reached the British government. What gold may not have arisen at the touch of this enchanted wand! There were no wires in those days to carry a breathing from Brussels to Exchange. The energetic enterprise of Nathan in this instance created the greatness of the London house, as did John Walter's create that of the London Times. There is no question that, with the death of Baron James, the genius of the house of Rothschild has departed. Constant intermerriage with cousins, and the absence of that intellectual vig-or which the infusion of fresh, new blood imparts, has its effect on men as on animals, and the younger of the family are far inferior to the elder. They are prudent—a rose-colored phrase for mean—and like old issac of York, can higgle for a price; but the money genius, the insight to the financial future, and the house; and the same spirit permeates | London ntatives in New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, and all over the European continent. In 1847, the period of the Irish famine, though the corn bills of both continents passed through their hands, giving them ample opportunities for preparation, they wers unable to breast the financial storm, but flew before it, selling all their securities, and causing the great fall in consols of that year. Their transactions too, are of an inferior character. Except with Austria, they are not, as in the days of old Nathan and his sons. the props of thrones. Most of the great government transactions of the country ich offer the vastest field for the future, have been conducted of late years through the house of Baring Brothers, of London, and Corcoran & Riggs, of Washington. Meyer Rothschild, just dead, always contented himself with holding a second position to his brother Lionel, both in business and society, and never came to the foreground. He generally confined himself to the office of the firm, in New Court, and governed from the desk. He resided with his brothers in Piccadilly, close to Apsley house, the town palace of "the duke," where their ordinary life, like those of all wealthy Jews, was surrounded with every appliance of luxury and where they entertained always with a graceful, often with a splendid, hospitality. The turf and field are their favorite pastime. Their stable, which has been the special care of Meyer Rothschild, is at Leatherhead-John Scott's-where now for upward of twenty years they have cultivated what Disraeli describes as "England's noblest pastime." Lionel Rothschild has been rewarded by that "blue ribbon of the turf," for which Lord George Bentinck, at moments in his brief but excited political life, longed for beyond the highest reward which olitics should bestow. Lionel might have won it even far earlier with Orestes, in 1853, had not a foul grain or two been introduced into the horse's oats the night before the race. His hunting-box as been at Mentmore, some forty miles from London, on the Northwestern rail, where are kept up a splendid stud and a noble park-these also having been entirely under the mastership of Meyer Rothschild. Both Lionel and Meyer were in parliament in politics. They entered the political arena to assist, in crowning the temple of freedom by the emancipation of their race, and wiping away the last persecuting spot from the statute book of England. They are now both removed from the scene, Lionel having lost his election in London. Mr.

| B74. | B75. | The New York Bulletin, February 18th, re-ports: "The market for cotion on the spot is nominally unchanged, but in tone is very un-settled. The business, it appears, is mainly for export, but even this demand subsided at the close, and left the market without support under the free receipts and the steady accu-mulation of stocks. In future delivery the market opened weak, and declined through-out the day; the close is at inside prices. The disappointment respecting the course of redisappointment respecting the course of re-ceipts, a quiet report from Liverpool and the decline in gold, are the principal influences that are felt in the market."

Wat. Strong, Attorney, 27 Main st. 186 He emphatically says that it is not true that one western statesman congratulated the duke on the successes of his father in France, and that another wanted to know if it was always cold in Russia. Far from it; but the reason why his highness forgot and said it is suggested by the exasperated writer in the insimation that perhaps the duke was disappointed because the people of Nebraska didn't rush forth with frenziel curiosity to behold him. Then follows a dark and mysterious hope that the royal writer has related how many times he shot at and missed one very large buffalo, and how the animal was finally wounded by the daring Buffalo Bill and respectfully held by the horns while his highness killed him.
